Video games have gone from being a family-friendly activity to something that is exclusive to the world's elite, with most of us getting to know our musical heroes thanks to Rock Band. But for one player, the virtual guitar was the key to beating Alzheimer's disease. Stanford University researchers at the Alzheimer's Disease Research Center in San Francisco are researching ways of treating the disease through an improved understanding of the disease. In collaboration with the Civista lab at the Chan-Zuckerberg Biohub in Palo Alto, California, they plan to create a video game that will teach players about the disease and how to detect signs of the disease. This could help with early detection and potentially help manage symptoms. The researchers will teach the players through a virtual, simulated environment, in a two-hour training programme, that will teach the players about the disease. Players will be asked to identify signs of Alzheimer's, including mood swings, changes in speech and a

Pediatric intraoral foreign bodies: temporal trends and results of manual removal. The aim of this study is to analyze a large cohort of children who underwent foreign body removal (FBs) in order to evaluate their characteristics, methods of removal, and results. A descriptive retrospective review of pediatric patients with a new diagnosis of an intraoral FB was performed. Demographic data, method of FB removal, and complications were recorded. A total of 168 children underwent manual FB removal. Mean age was 6.1 years. FBs were most commonly located in the buccal mucosa (72.8%) or cheek (21.3%). Complications occurred in 22 cases (13.1%). The most common complication was laceration (7.7%), followed by bleeding (4.8%), infection (4.3%), soft tissue injury (1.2%), pneumatization of the cheek (0.6%), and intraoral perforation (0.6%). A majority of FBs were removed using less invasive techniques (86.3%). Manual FB removal is associated with a low rate of complications when performed in an experienced pediatric oral and maxillofacial surgery unit. Q: Why do we not need a pre-amplifier for audio to go to the ear? Why do we not need a pre-amplifier to make a sound louder when it reaches the ear? A: The ear is an astonishing thing. For example, the human ear has a low pass frequency cut-off around 1.6MHz which is well beyond the range of most electronic signals. Ears receive sound waves in a wave packet and will analyze and/or store the motion of the air molecules between peaks. This process takes a lot of time compared to the speed of sound. Assuming there is no appreciable delay of the carrier wave, then the ear needs to know the "rough" position of the peak of the wave packet, and what the peak amplitude and phase might be. However, this can only be determined after the frequency of the wave packet has been "wavelength resolved", and it is 3e33713323
